

WHAT BRINGS YOU TO DEL AMO

VIRGINIA CHASE SUTTON

What Brings You To Del Amo

Virginia Chase Sutton

for John

Contents

MANIC	1
HOUSEKEEPING	3
NOTHING ORDINARY	5
ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL	7
SNOW ANGEL	8
THE ECSTATIC RAPTURE	9
WHAT BRINGS YOU TO DEL AMO	11
DIET CLUB	15
ARS POETICA	16
AT THE BARRY M. GOLDWATER GUNNERY RANGE	18
COPPER STARS	19
THANKSGIVING	21
HIGH TEA	22
LIFE'S A BANQUET	23
AN IOWA PORK PRINCESS REMEMBERS	24
LOVING THE JUGGLER	25
TWENTY-FIVE YEARS A HEADLINER	27
TELLING MY COUSINS ABOUT SEX	28
AN OLD MAN'S ATONEMENT IN TRAUMA GROUP	29
DRUNK	32
NEVER CONSTRUCT NARRATIVE	33
THE TENANTS	36
THIS COLLAPSING WORLD	38
THERAPY INTERFERING BEHAVIOR	39
THE AFTERNOON MY MOTHER WEARS A PILLOWCASE OVER HER HEAD	41

MY BOYFRIEND'S A VAMPIRE.....	42
HOW HE SAVES ME	43
BLEEDING OUT.....	44
THE SPIRIT BABY.....	45
MY DAUGHTER NOTICES THE STRANGER.....	46
ADOLESCENT UNIT	47
LAST DAY IN PARIS	48
WATER LANDING.....	50
STUDY IN FLOWERS	51
NOVEMBER.....	53
Afterword	55
Acknowledgements.....	59

*But first you must be the sea and swallow everything in your path.
--Mary Ruefle*

MANIC

It's as fast as chugging boilermakers at Joe's Bar or preening in a rummage sale rayon forties dress

printed in phony pink Japanese symbols. Sometimes it's snatching plastic daffodils from someone's yard, convinced they're real or stealing a gold lamé sandal at a bar, leaving its owner to hobble home. How about painting your parents' basement in broad red, white and blue stripes, then bored, quitting halfway through? It's guzzling a fifth of whiskey on a dare and sending a two-pound Candygram to a pal, billing it to a name in the phonebook and deciding to rearrange all the furniture at two a.m. and eating not one but two hash brownies just to see what happens. It could be drunkenly running on a rainy street, falling and crawling the rest of the way home. Or you have sex with a guy you just met at Kentucky Fried Chicken or you down more than one bottle of pink champagne

at midnight, then hitch to the 7-Eleven at noon to buy a twelve-pack of beer. Maybe you're half-naked, getting tattooed on your right breast at Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, the bikers cheering you on. Perhaps you've been up all night again, reading the entire book because you can't wait or you're down at that dive on the railroad tracks where you swallow quarter glasses of Grain Belt, singing along to thirty-year-old jukebox songs or maybe you just feel something rushing between your fingers, gold rising into your mouth and head, knowing you can do nothing to stop this glory, nothing.

HOUSEKEEPING

was never discussed, just frozen dinners occasionally baked to the tiny iced heart in throw-away tin containers or pork chops, raw and reckless in the pan in the silent kitchen or dusty under the living room couch. My mother's not domestic. Endless Sunday afternoons she's visiting from the hospital.

After last fall's stroke, bedridden, trying to walk, to hold her head still on her neck. A red plaid cookbook's teaching me to make pot roast, directions like the buttery taste of meat too long in the oven. My father wants me at the hospital, helping with her wig as it falls goofy over her forehead, missing the long loopy scar. Can't, I tell him, this roast has to go in right now. What do we know of multi-hued vegetables, how to tuck shiny pieces beside the magenta meat? How can we learn to live with her again, silent conversations drowsy, her metal bedpan neat in a paper sack? It's easier to learn to cook, measuring what's required, following directions to the correct platter and spoon. The table's set with plastic dishes, dark sunbursts flat as our dinnertime faces. These stiff people eat plain meat and ordinary vegetables, my disappointment of a dull Midwestern language.

I'll do dishes, I call, avoiding the return trip. Last year, my home economics teacher taught the eighth grade girls that unspotted glassware equals domestic contentment.

You've got the knack, she said one afternoon, my little make-believe kitchen a gallery of pure light and clean pots.

NOTHING ORDINARY

My mother said Oh, I never wanted daughters.
She was smoking a cigar in the breezeway after school, the bright glow burning under her nose.
She said I've decided to become a man, then shook off the ashes with her left hand. Years later, while standing in a friend's kitchen complaining of the heat, a strange man raised a fistful of my brown hair in his big hand. My skin was water white, dripping little beads into my collar. He exhaled carefully across my neck, the silver bracelet on his left wrist a cold jangle along my skin. Close enough for the tip of his tongue to taste me, and he watched me shudder, lean into his careful darkness and pencil mustache.

Later, my friend said Do you like him? He's a woman, though his breasts are gone.
All that shivering flesh removed and black dot nipples stitched to his flat chest. How do you ever know? What's it like to be a man, to wear black and draw in fine lines above the upper lip? A man stood beside me and was steeped in my sweat and some terrible longing. Could I have been remade, turned into a boy long ago, allowed the ashes from my mother's tightly rolled stogie to smear into my eyes, blurring my gender? Girls are such trouble, she used to say. They cry too much. I didn't cry then, not ever.

I won't be a boy, I told her.

And you can't be a man. The cigar burned down another inch, losing liquid and light. Are you sure, she asked, the voice the same when the dark man said I know what you're thinking. Then his face moved a little closer, a little sweeter, one kiss closer to my mouth.

ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL

Outside it's over one hundred degrees and inside the air conditioning hasn't worked on the psych ward for five days.

We're in sweat up to our chins.
In the plain-as-milk dayroom, old magazines someone's donated, overflow like end of summer roses, drooping last minute petals over a cast-off table. A number of patients need to shower. The summer I first read Mishima, he was already dead, suicide's beautiful gesture. Only once have I seen the brief film made from the story, the dress rehearsal for his death. Shot in black and white, he's the soldier, kneeling before the unsheathed sword. Everything's taken care of: he's made love to his wife, bathed, now it's time for that bleak gray shudder.

Were those tears in his eyes? He holds electric perfection in one hand.

White cloth cinches the soldier's belly.
How he waited forever for this moment, his splendid flesh gleaming! Ready to go. That same summer I loved a man whose stomach muscles rippled through his thin t-shirt.

sharper than the ritual I watched on the screen, or read in any Japanese novel.
This summer's lasting too long.

SNOW ANGEL

Sunday afternoon, January, we're just getting out of bed, when I say Do me a favor.
And you answer What? I tell you Don't call or come to see me again.

That's it, the last of four months of fucking. See something inside is pulsing, not your embrace or the wetness between my legs, but some wild, wicked drowning like it isn't going to stop. I run out to the hard-blast sky and yell I know, I know, I know.

Breathing hard, I have to sit in a drift, thrust my almost purple hands into the snow. That roar, no way to explain, my body spilling liquid, the absolutely insatiable know. It divides men into fuckable or non-fuckable, though in an emergency, who knows? You knock me over, our last fuck spinning my seventeen-year-old ass into the cold. You are a man I never cared to know. Hey, picture me there, the black and gray winter sky splitting only for me. I am a crazy snow angel, burn my image, dig it into the snow.

THE ECSTATIC RAPTURE

Here is the man in a plain suit, his ordinary striped tie tucked behind too narrow lapels. The woman lets him in, the hypnotist, La Cirella.

His shoes leave soggy splotches on the beige rug. It doesn't matter.
They sip cocktails, hers an ice fog of gin, his heavy bourbon. He reaches for the sweet cherry with two manicured fingers deep along the cold glassy bottom. The girl watches from the kitchen, pours fine shards of ice into the bucket, refills the metal trays with tap water. He doesn't look much like a hypnotist, she thinks. Where are the tricks? The spangled ponies jumping from thin air, the puff of smoke, explosions of amber stars across some vast stage?

The woman calls her daughter in, wants La Cirella to carve hollows beneath that throat, narrow the breasts already straining beneath the sailor suit. The girl has gathered sweet peas from the yard, put their stalks in water glasses on each table in the living room.

She likes their silly heads bending for more water, petals tipped in a dim blush of color. Delicate hands reach for her, pale half moons rising on each finger, and suddenly, she knows what he can see behind brass military buttons and sailcloth, down to her last bone and bruise. Underneath that pale blue suit his body rises, and she sees him sticky against her mother, and then between her own fat thighs. When he tells them to fall back on the sofa, to follow the simple glitter of his watch with their eyes, they do as they are told. They go willingly.

Last night the woman sat on the nightclub's small stage and let her red curls tumble when her head fell flush to her chest. He must have told the audience that she was an animal just before death, a white chicken ahead of the falling axe. Then her body moved in some kind of desperate longing, struggling against the folds of her smoky dress.

Bending and bending, she lowered her head and danced on wobbly legs. Later, she asked him home for cocktails, longing to close her eyes again to his voice, the spin of an object, the jewel just put away.

The chrome sky outside cracks and leaks while he decides which animals they shall become.

WHAT BRINGS YOU TO DEL AMO

Saturday and Sunday afternoons stutter past; patients spend a few hours listening to someone's particular story.
What brings us to Del Amo. This empty room, empty shelves. One by one, we must speak.

And our journey, what puts us in a locked psych ward for weeks, well, it's not as if anyone could save us.

What brings you to Del Amo? Steven asks.

Steven's a part time therapist, working weekends, dead end shifts no one bids for. To keep busy, he provides the basic question.

Distraction. No picking at angry sores marching up an ankle, or the crust beneath gauze bandages, though Nancy rewraps better than any aide. She was a nurse before the alters. Now all those traumatized pieces, other voices and splintered interior selves, pester her twenty-four-seven.

Does someone want to answer the question? Steven asks.

Steven's a model of patience in khaki pants, muted golf shirt, black marker in hand, poised at the white board. Someone says:

My mother was a drunk. Started passing out when I was eight: bed, couch, bathroom and kitchen floors.

Dark urine spoiled the cushions, lapped the linoleum. She was an island of flesh, dead center in a yellow lake.

*

Steven stops the questions. He is all concern.

Who are you, Steven asks one of us.

The woman wraps a stuffed animal in a Winnie the Pooh baby blanket before she says I'm Little Amy. She's a different personality, not who he needs her to be.

Red snout and black floppy ears, her toy's a dog. I need Elizabeth, Steven says, caps the marker. She's not here, Little Amy answers, clutches the bundle high on her chest. Elizabeth's somewhere deep inside, can't come out right now.

I need an adult. This is no place for children, Steven says.

And Little Amy leaves the room.

*

Begin where you want to begin, Steven says.

He doesn't mean it. We're so weary of repetition: number of suicide attempts (methods used), mental health disorders (name them), depression (when did it begin?), anonymous sex (did your actions put you in danger?), blackouts and drugs (list addictions), number of rapes, molestations (include all touch).

Steven, how many kinds of abuse exist?

Our weekend afternoons catalogue lists, someone please answer his persistent question,

What brings you here?

*

I can always tell when my roommate becomes Jeff, different personality, male swagger, demands house cigarettes.
Never mind that Lucy doesn't smoke.

Chain-smoking in the courtyard, Jeff fiddles with the padlocks. It's easy to bust out, if I wanted to. I believe him. Yesterday he burned Lucy's cheek with a butt, then skipped out. She took his punishment.

When Jeff's out I refuse to sleep in our room. Sarah helps me drag my mattress down to the Quiet Room where the light's left on all night.

Makes sleeping tough but it bores Jeff. He doesn't want me either.
He prefers to sleep alone.

*

The adult Heidi says:

*The middle school band director squeezed my breasts, forced me to lie to the principal.
When I stepped hard on his foot he made me look at the bruise, said what will I tell my mother?
See what you did?*

Sometimes Heidi becomes Secret. It's in her voice, the way it swivels from her body, the way she jitters in her chair. So many children here. How to manage disassociation? Right now, some of us are in parts, pieces, alters, those named and unknown. The Fat

*Woman wants to kill me, Nancy says.
And I don't know why. We didn't do anything to her. Lucy's Miranda now,* covering the walls with elaborate collages, bits and pieces, pictures and words ripped from years of National Geographic, the only magazine here. One Sunday morning she shaped two figures from a pile of coffee stirrers, the large plastic body bending to hold the little one's hand.

The afternoon ends like all weekend afternoons.
Steven swipes the board, where one of our histories, once under discussion, vanishes, discarded, like an old library book that hasn't been off the shelf in years. You can see the fine layer of dust and torn pages mended by a steady hand.

DIET CLUB

On Saturday mornings, our neighbor, Mrs. Benson, waits on her front porch. We hurry to the blue and white bathroom, the scale resting on the tile floor.

Never cheating, we don't ask one another where the black line stops. Every week

I say I haven't lost a pound. She's majestic on the fur-covered toilet lid, confiding diet tips over the crash of her five kids against the door.

Leaving, I squirm past knowing eyes, the son who sits behind me in sixth grade. No one ever notices me. My mother's not a classroom helper, doesn't know jack about PTA or Girl Scouts or even Home Room Mom, yet this club is her idea. Force the weight off, she explains, before it's too late.

Stomping in puddles, scraping the sidewalk, I'm later each time until my mother says I give up. But she doesn't. Secret, she whispers, and pours a fistful of pills into my cupping hands.

Her cultivated taste for bourbon and pills made her forget food long before.

They work. Sullen and wide-hipped, I swallow them.
My heart's hit dead-center. Heavy breath on my face, her broken eyes don't notice later, when my bottle's empty. I've thrown them away.

She thinks this is the trick, I know it works, she says.
This time she's sure.

ARS POETICA

She unfolds a bent staple the way someone unwraps a creased handkerchief, smoothing the edges open. Without a mirror, she cuts into her face. The staple scrapes from forehead into the crease of her mouth. Deep red kisses well along the ragged scratch.

Someone removes the cap from a cheap pen, saws her left wrist until it separates, bleeding. She spends the night sitting in the hallway outside my room. At midnight I crouch beside her, whisper, Come back, come back. A pillow's untouched and someone's left her a small stuffed dog. The famous psychiatrist who runs this place challenges me to write a poem, his face blooming via video conference call all the way from Dallas. It can be, he says, about nothing. I'm already dead.

He tries to stump me with quotations from Blake and Eliot. Buddy, I want to tell him, I'm medicated off my ass.
Last count ten different pills, but I don't self harm, so the staff opens a little office and I'm left alone. Nearly three hours later, I have a couple of lines. I wrap myself in a blue hospital blanket, head to the dayroom where everyone's watching TV. Someone turns the volume down. Did you write a poem? They want to hear it, my suicide poem, but why tell them what they've already lived? On the third evening here my roommate unthreaded the string from her sweatshirt's hood, wrapped it tight around her neck. Not a hanging, exactly, more like strangulation. It took two nurses to unwind her. She was sent to another ward, watched around the clock, dressed in a paper gown and a paper blanket to keep her safe. And me, left alone to write a poem after weeks of observation? I sit in an office chair and try to work, don't even check the clock.

Maybe I miss the mandatory fifteen minute check-ins, click of the flashlight in my face, fists banging on a closed bathroom door, always someone with a clipboard and careful little notes: Patient in the unused office for two hours and forty-five minutes. She did not self harm. How odd to suddenly be unwatched. When I read the poem to my therapist, she sits for a minute, says Somehow I thought it would be much longer.

AT THE BARRY M. GOLDWATER GUNNERY RANGE in Gila Bend, Arizona, all's gone still with his death, the entire satellite base draped in black garlands, even the old soda machine outside the commissary. Someone's wrapped bunting around two elderly airplanes, display pieces that haven't been flown in twenty-five years, military remnants that never rust in endless desert. Just a few years ago

I drove eighty-five miles from Phoenix twice a week to teach a composition class.
During breaks, soldiers gathered outside in the heat, scanning the flat sky. Then one night out in the hallway, a soldier tapped my chest, said, How I love you, can't you tell? Gin fumes drifted under my nose, a fever breaking. Don't you see that I'm too old for this? he asked, then cried as MPs dragged him into the dusty shadows, his feet kicking up little sparks. Don't forget me, he called.

Back in the narrow classroom, one young man explained, As the highest ranking military person here,

I offer apologies. The entire force is dishonored.
I've heard the Space Sky Motel in town offers the Republican Special, two nights in the Barry M.
Goldwater suite for $29.95, plus continental breakfast.

Always I wanted to shout My parents told me he was the enemy each time I pulled up to the guardhouse and the soldier said, Present ID and get out of the car.
But I never said a word as the same tall man searched my car, his flashlight's dull beam the only glimmering light on the dirt road. I thought of all the patient soldiers driving the flat sharp perimeters of the quiet base, over and over, nothing to do but wait.

COPPER STARS

I want a tangle of stars, I tell her and she draws a line on the fat pad over my left shoulder, dissolving down my back. Honey, she says, I've tattooed them from Portland, Oregon to Portland, Maine.

Driving down to Bisbee last year, the closest I've come to Mexico, desert hills and mountain edges were purple smears over the hard smack of highway. I headed into the corkscrew of abandoned mining pits, shacks, the town stacked inside an empty bowl.

How many steps through sulfur clouds, the taint still as water inside a clawfoot tub?
Out on the verandah, the day finished, a crocheted doily on the yellow afternoon.

I want the stars to open, I tell her, stars blown inside out, the bite on my skin. Indigo outlines like cheap ink. Sure, sure, she answers, then, I'm adding little comets.

It feels good. New explosions popping over weepy blue threads. Maybe a little lavender, for color, I say, recalling broken historic markers and deserted shops back when copper went bust.
A thin shimmer, a tin roof grasping the last bit of night sky before sunrise, old stone steps forgotten in corners. The kind of light that's down some mine shaft someone started digging in the dark. Remember the sudden snow shower in the desert, how white chilled the edges? No problem, and she shifts her grip on my arm. All I want is a little color to ignite this row of shabby stars, moonstruck and loopy, like an old postmark pressed across my smooth flesh.

THANKSGIVING

One slice of white meat's my request in the cafeteria line but it's all the same, white and dark compressed into a jellied loaf. I take it anyway. At thirteen I made my first turkey, more than twenty pounds, for three people. Mother was in a coma after brain surgery, my father so distracted, my sister locked in her room.
I named the bird Fred, bathed his nakedness in the sink, closing my eyes to the bloody neck and packet of guts tucked inside.
A pink spill draining. I did it all: potatoes, stuffing, pumpkin pie out of the can. More than thirty years later I'm at a hospital table with seven patients, our meal on heavy paper plates. We're allowed one container of low-calorie imitation cranberry sauce apiece.
It's only noon, so much time before the day ends and we abandon ourselves to meds and sleep. No seconds allowed here. A patient suggests we each speak of thankfulness.
My mind's an empty plate. Early evening, a visitor brings Lucy an entire dinner on a disposable plate wrapped in foil.
It's still warm. We all pull chairs to the table, watch her eat the plain, holiday food. Then a nurse walks over, her pockets stuffed with candy. She hands a bag of chocolate to each one of us.
Because it's Thanksgiving, she says, and we deserve a blessing.

HIGH TEA

--Smith College, 1946

Twin china pots on ecru crochet differ only by a faded rosebud's partial unfurling. This is the family secret I've heard all my life: aging silver teaspoons monogrammed with someone else's initials, heavy cream perfect in my great-aunt's cut glass pitcher.

My parents arrive for tea just days after their elopement. Eleanor wears a beret, holds the thin saucer and bone china cup while Great-aunt Mary Ellen, writer, beloved teacher, English professor, directs a pale stream into the delicate shell.
It's Royal Doulton, the set safe now in my china closet, patterned in lazy fall gardens trellising up and over each spout. The women are lovers, my mother must whisper, loving this unfolding. I can explain the rest of the day by heart; how my father begins to watch the lovers while he learns the precise rehearsal of crystaled sugar, the proper grasp of silver tongs. Black currant, jasmine, oolong, he mouths the litany of tea leaves. Trays of sandwiches spin into pinwheels. How well Great-aunt Mary Ellen knows the flowery taste of her lover's mouth, the twist of her tongue sampling each glowing bite. A Classics professor, Eleanor recites in Latin, in Greek. Bishop's hats, madelines, strawberries in eddies of chocolate. He can't decide so Eleanor smiles at my mother, fills his plate with shortbread and scones, dips into a well of clotted cream and cherry jam.

LIFE'S A BANQUET

Most patients toss their entire meals into the garbage, and who can blame us? Two doughy pancakes or a box of Cap'n Crunch, sticky tofu stir fry, maybe an over-cooked chicken breast. Still, it's better than my mother's cooking or my own. I learn an anorexic trick—carry a huge cup of diet soda all day. A series of little sips. Kills the appetite. Eating disorder patients slip across the hall to purge in my bathroom because theirs is locked. I smell sour leftovers though they flush and flush.

What's the best meal you ever had, a skinny patient asks. I don't remember particulars though my purse rested on a tapestry stool and the waiter poured from a plastic bottle of Evian. For an entire week, the cafeteria gives me a steamed turkey sandwich at lunch. No reason for the yellow cheese sopping into the bread and the meat floppy like a recently slaughtered carcass. The dietitian has mean black eyes. We can't have peanut butter unless it's breakfast, and never extra bread. We grow adept at stealing. Once Nancy fingered six cookies while Roxy coated the table with a thin layer of jelly. Next meal she said, Someone better mop up this stickiness. We all laughed, our pockets bursting with hard boiled eggs, sliced pickles, stuff from the salad bar, collecting for a late night feast though most of it was destined for the trash.

AN IOWA PORK PRINCESS REMEMBERS

My crown was a circlet of sparkle and flame, uneasy atop the long slick of my yellow hair. I wore it the week of the State Fair in '74 when all the county princesses held court in the agricultural building.

Dressed in white, we were a mirage of angels, our bouquets of ivory gladiolas leaking summer's humidity from blunt cut stalks.

That was the first time I heard them. The piggy voices were soprano, as sweet as a forkful of their tender, shredded flesh. They said, We died for each of you, to make you queenly, and their rich voices rose, frothing around us like a huge lacy slip, a flurry of rice on someone's wedding day. I still hear their glorious chants, For you, for you, though I've nearly forgotten the trip to Des Moines, posing on the courthouse steps in our seamless formality. We remember your happiness, your grace. And they do. They've gone to canneries and packing plants and still they cry. Pickled and succulent, in brine, we continue our song. They recall the sweep of my gown, the summer I was royalty, supreme in my ice tiara. Little skeletons, sing. No sacrifice too great. Sing again.

We are sweet summer flowers. The pigs remember the moment, my elbow length gloves, each button and sliver of glitter. We steam.
They call me, knuckle and bone. We steam.

LOVING THE JUGGLER

Late at night when the narrow wheels of the train are clacking, and when my heart is beating as if it will never stop, he calls to me. My dimpled dolly, his arms flung open, sweat tumbling from oily leather hands. In the moment he snakes around my hips, drooling on my rippling thighs. Oh, little mountains, he sings as the sheet slips, bedclothes a pale knot, his taffeta costume shooting stars, little pinpricks of light all along my swells and curves. Sometimes we feed the elephants after the last show, let them nibble leftover peanuts from our palms as we move in their slow cadence, stately as their wrinkled skins, trunks reaching blind towards the kind face next door.

Someone whispers Jack when he curls my hair into tender sausages, a tumble into my wide bodice, trickling down the back of my satin gown, an enormous sweep of blue, black as any post-midnight sky. What does he look like without makeup, a showgirl wonders between acts. How they adore the faithful slide of his shoes on sawdust, the tricks as he capers around the ring, a blur of stiff ruffles. And I love his pancake self, whiteness smoothed across his face, frosting the sharp wings of his neck and back.

Leave it on, I tell him when both hands hold my breast to his puckering mouth.

In every town our stages sit side by side.

Wanda the Wondrous, my banner billowing above the low couch, clutch of pillows and soft velvet where I recline as the marks pause before us. I'm watching Juggling Jack.

He reaches a long arm to unfasten the string of beads from my throat, and in the big silence, he unspools each bead in a jumble of heat, scrolling the pieces over his slippery hands.

TWENTY-FIVE YEARS A HEADLINER

Face it, the old gal was born for the business. Sturdy legs, acres of crinkly skin, her contortionist trunk fielding baskets, bottles, a million other circus props. How many showgirls climbed her dusty wide back, loving the gentle way she rocked them around the ring? All those clowns dangling from her jaws while she'd spin, rocketing dizzy circles.

And talented! Not every elephant can dance the two-step, twirl fluorescent hoops, clang a tambourine, and shower the first three rows with confetti blown from her trunk.

But lately, Flora's been dreamy. She doesn't care about horses cantering alongside or even for the acrobat hanging by her hair far above the ring. She's thinking of hay, enough for forever, how it ripens just so beneath a hot summer sky. And she imagines the world's largest Jacuzzi, oh sinking all the way in, aching knees and spine blasted in bone-melting water. Beloved Flora! So many assist her retirement fund. At five bucks a pop they line up after the show for a souvenir photo. Profile only, Flora insists, one little eye gleaming. Her tired trunk's coiled like the old days.

Back when Flora trumpeted show time, entire body balancing on one leg, giant mystery rising, a slamdance kid, ready.

TELLING MY COUSINS ABOUT SEX

Telling my cousins about sex occupies an entire Christmas afternoon upstairs on my great-grandmother's bed.
Below, thready hits from the forties spin off the old piano, the muffled noise of Indiana twangs. It starts with his tongue, I tell the three sisters, and their narrow faces sharpen.
I explain too much: his body's shove deep into the mattress, slick colors and skin tints, our slow travel to the body's end. Does it hurt, one asks, picking at her skirt's gray pleats. Almost identical, these girls with long hair dividing the centers of their high foreheads and neat brows. So I sit up, whisper, Open a window when you're done. The youngest cousin, forever excluded, speaks from the corner, Why ever for? I answer the mirror above the chest as it bends close to our tangle of arms and legs. You'll smell him for days, I say.
And then, You'll like it, you really will.
They lean on skinny necks as I describe how my hands arrange his skin's burnt pleasures, his cock, and the dark bruises of his body, leave nothing unfinished.

AN OLD MAN'S ATONEMENT IN TRAUMA GROUP

Truth is a protector, Lucy tells us. She's like a boil on your forehead growing bigger, taking everything in. She guards the system, decides what we need, then tells us.

I hate sleeping with my father, press of his legs against me. How I ride the bed's edge, hope his body won't press into mine.

Someone's crying. She walks to the circle's center, pulls a wad of tissue from the box where the therapist left it. The therapist insists grief is not intrusive. The old man, perpetrator, startles, struggles out of his chair, the door clicks. Bastard, I think. Remember this when you're close to a little girl.

What happens in the bed I cannot remember. I offer him to my sister but she refuses.

Many women are crying, this safe place where we voice our stories, litter of pieces, share as much trauma as we dare.

There was something between us, always. And I knew it in his kiss, the way he captured my lips though I ducked, tried to hide from his gooey mouth.

The therapist asks over the tears, all the noses blowing, How does it feel to say something so terrible?

The old man returns to Trauma Group. No longer triggered by our truths. The old man will speak to an empty chair, psych invention. All have the same frayed padding, knotted blue cover, a bitch to get your ass out of after you've been sitting for hours.

Pretend this empty chair is your wife. Imagine. What do you need to say?

James answers, Beverly, I'm sorry for destroying our family, leaving you alone to face the town and friends. Now I'm morally clean. God has forgiven me.

The empty chair is motionless. The old man leans, one hand brushes the air.

I've done everything required. Jail, this hospital program. God hears my wholesome prayers.

We witness his atonement. But better disassociation, vanish from this stuffy room into the California sun outside. My slipper stubs the carpet. I want to slap him with my bare open hand, knock his false teeth from his jaw. Let's see some real tears. Steady breath: in and out, almost too much trouble.

Are you ready for a little feedback? The therapist asks flatly.

And their voices splinter: Maybe she'll forgive ... Your daughters, granddaughters ... I cried for you, James.

I don't believe. Just another wall of words.

Dues paid, how very biblical. Yellow face quivering, silky mustache floats above your upper lip, you're any old man. Three granddaughters you hurt with hands clasped in your lap, fingers still.

We're always indoors, either this room or that. Small airplanes drone overhead, careful spins before heading to the ocean. Everything I know is this locked ward and constant circling above. Sometimes I see a plane when the aide takes us to dinner through the padlocked courtyard to the cafeteria, or a glimpse of impossibly green grass. When dinner's done, it's too late to view once-in-this-lifetime meteor showers.

Say anything in Trauma Group. Name your secret: fathers, brothers, kindly neighbors, your fourth grade teacher, your mother. How it happens over and over. Here's the place for words no one outside wants to hear, though you've been trying to speak for years.

When the real Beverly shows up to take the old man home to Akron, I stare.
Nervous, her head is a helmet of nut-brown hair. She flutters around the nurses' station. How can you take him back? I'm not allowed to ask. We're protected from him by ten-foot invisible boundaries.

Do you see us old man, how we tremble out of nightmares weeping? Do you wish now you hadn't touched them? Do you look at the circle of chairs?

On his last day, he presses a small gift into everyone's palm but mine. Look, Sarah says, see what James made? Tiny origami purses, construction of sharp paper and careful angles. It's for mad money. Charmed, Sarah barely touches a finger to its center. It gapes open.

Remember this, Lucy says. Truth forever climbs out of your head, itchy bump, bug bite gone mad. Trust her. She keeps us safe.

DRUNK

What's the drunkest you've ever been, he's asking. Tell me.
As if I've forgotten the perfect stillness when my head fills with a luscious rising, each new drink a pink orbit around my head. I swallow it all.
Blackouts, I say, remembering what it's like to step so far outside that the body still continues. Once I drank a fifth of whiskey on a bet. Eighteen and aching, almost a rock and roll death, a tangle of dried vomit in my hair. I woke up. A man gave me a gun in a bar, and I sat on it, hiding the metal lump under the thick spread of my thighs. It pinched. I left eggs boiling on the stove, wandered home hours later to their lovely, moist explosions, all the water fizzed away. Vanished. Their hard little shells, dead white scraps littering the kitchen counters. Had sex with a stranger at a party. I left him there, on the shower stall floor when it was over, unconscious and dribbling into the drain. Stole three thousand cocktail swords from a bar's closet, my coat pocket stuffed with their unsettled sharpness, then I tossed them in someone's yard. I threw up on a woman's shoe. My lover's mother didn't seem surprised. She washed her foot, mopped the floor and my pale face, put me back to bed.
Drunk enough to meet you, I tell him, remembering our walk home through the woods, staggering over snow packed hard enough to hold us up.
We roll over in the cold dark, dizzy, dizzy with what? Drunk enough for you, I say.

NEVER CONSTRUCT NARRATIVE

1.

Huge shadow erection, an inflatable balloon stolen from a bizarre parade, sort of like the blow-up doll we discovered in an unused room at my daughter's school, pile of porn magazines, someone's hiding place.

Only this is on the ceiling. Look away, count to twenty. It's still there.

2.

I'm thirteen again, brand new babysitter.
One child adores me as I sit on the floor and play dolls. The eighteen-month-old runs, though when it's time to change her diaper, she allows me to lift her to the table, unpin the soaking cloth.

And it's true, thirty years later, in this mix of vulnerability and business-as-usual, I'm thinking How easy to harm a child, and no one would ever know.

3.

Streaky smoke from a thousand packs of cigarettes, my childhood's familiar fragrance, overwhelming. I smell it when I make my grandmother's date-nut pudding, my father's favorite, on Christmas Eve, and in my therapist's office. Curious times.

Do you smell cigarettes? I ask my daughter in line at the grocery store. Mom, no one's smoking here, she says in a patient voice I'm beginning to dislike. There's no one smoking at all.

4.

My father's final words were a song: Good Night Ladies.

Then he died. Tonight at the movies, I hear him singing beside me, but I don't bother to turn while he sings Many brave hearts are asleep in the deep, so beware, still trying for the low note.

5.

Do you want to know why it's an error to create narrative?

the shrink asks. Please explain the memories, odors, enormous shadow cock

I see on the ceiling. Your mind reveals a glimpse of what's too painful to remember more fully.

How can the door knob rattle and twist when no one is there?

All you get are scraps. Don't string them into a story. Just take them as they come. Like when I see my dead father standing behind me, barely out of the corner of my eye? Accept them as they reveal themselves. They come from so far away. Lemons from the tree in the front yard, chopped into wedges, so sour

I squirm in yellow waves of juice. It's everywhere and it stains as it stings. You must accept them. Oh, I promise, I will.

THE TENANTS

I saw them everywhere: in the backyard spiraling up inside the pale lilacs, invisible in the hall closet where old books were stored, even playing in the fireplace ash. Late at night,

I'd bump into them in the bathroom. The tile floor was icy and they were on their knees, all those homeless spirits, blowing night air into a cold fog.

They watched me learn to dance over that floor, my feet turning blue as a fresh bruise. Oh, they were in the basement too, snoozing and snoring, exhaling clouds of oil fumes and dirt from every duct.

Mostly, I heard them laugh. Very late, after everyone was in bed, they sailed into my room, telling me, Roll over.

But they were restless, climbing out the window and ruining the ivy if I so much as blinked twice.

Leave, I'd say, but they'd look limp and listless, even a bit damp and I'd say, Never mind. They were most comfortable in candlelight, safe in the dining room where my mother set places for them each night when the dark outside matched the darkness inside. She created a feast of letters and numbers, the words yes and no.

How they loved to sip from the highball glass she tilted upside down, how they hurried to fill up that glass! We watched their giddy spins over the tabletop forming chains of letters and words. My mother asked them so many questions like, Why not move in? Little droplets shivered over the table and they lapped it all up. Once invited, they never left.

They kept me up all night with silent chatter, like visiting children who don't know when Dinner in five minutes really means Go home. They thrust tiny fingers down the neck of my pajamas, accused me of hogging the covers, spoke all night of secret messages.

Bored, they stooped to stealing car keys then cash, gossiping about our careless fumbblings, never minding that I was listening, that I heard it all.

THIS COLLAPSING WORLD

--for my mother

1.

I hate his touch, my mother tells me. The moon outside stays outside, small shivers of light. In this dark place, this nursing home, at night, it's quiet after meds and bed baths. Sometimes the window's nothing but sky. Two old women roommates, sleeping, And I am awake, she says. His hands, nighttime aide, are working hands, such rough skin. I cannot move, haven't moved from hospital beds and wheelchairs for years. I do not want him, she says. It's not every night, but listen. How to save us? This cold room he likes best, Iced breath in my ear, touching when I cannot speak. His shoes soundless beside the bed. How long, please?

I'm asking. Send me to another place.

2.

How does the body stiffen, each joint and corner? It's flat little puddles where water beads, my mother's hands slipping. Oh, of the body, by the body, is her body filling with some strange light? All her fingers are lank petals and inside is rose, redness, dark passion. It's not easy, this pain she cannot contain. How many times was she told to be perfect, to be still. This bowl holds warm water and her hand is a cup longing to be open again. She says she understands but to never move again! When this touching is over, the caretakers, women in white, don't understand her, just wrap her in warm sleep. She counts and counts. It's either left or right and even this body—well, it's enough.

THERAPY INTERFERING BEHAVIOR

Roxy's cheeking nighttime meds, right in front of the nurses who make us stand at the counter washing pills down one at a time. Roxy swaps ambien for five bucks and a percocet with another patient. Is that a good deal? I ask. I get two, and never once thought to spit them out and make a little money.

I'd rather sleep. When I got here, the nurses searched my body and my suitcase, confiscated chapstick because Medicated was on the label. It took a doctor's order to get it back from the contraband room.

For two nights, Nicole was a patient.
It's the hospital or jail, she said, but didn't explain. Then she ate all our snacks: twenty-five packets of cookies. Bingeing and purging.

She blamed staff for not stopping her. That's therapy-interfering behavior, Libby told us in a special group meeting.
They kicked Nicole out, so I guess she's in jail. On Sundays my husband brings a hot dog with extra onions, and tomatoes. He has to unwrap it at the counter before I get it.

At night, the unit shuts down like a dying daisy, the nurses' station's surrounded by mattresses stripped from their beds. They look a little like broken petals.

Those on high suicide watch or active self-harmers have to sleep here, twenty-four hour direct observation.

A couple of nights ago my new roommate tore her bandaged wrists while sleeping, reopened the wounds. Her spattering blood drenched the bed linens. Now I have the room to myself. I say I'm sorry to her but I'm not.

Every morning I still wake at four, take a little stroll down the hall. Someone's sitting in the safe chair, coloring, a couple of patients are sobbing.
A few manage to sleep somehow, their stuffed toys lost in rumpled blankets, their arms flung out, curled on plastic mattresses under the constant light.

THE AFTERNOON MY MOTHER WEARS A PILLOWCASE OVER HER HEAD to protect her ten dollar wash and set from bird droppings makes me sorry, somehow, for the cat who brought the bird into the apartment.

The pillowcase is satin, slightly askew, a pink pale as the deep interior of her cat's narrow throat. I've come today with a dozen oranges, their ripeness familiar bumps inside the paper sack. Mother's sitting in the green recliner, a cigarette burning down to ash in her good right hand.
That idiot cat, she says, her voice muffled under the cloth. I drop the fruit.
Oranges spin to the balcony's half-open door. The cat waits on the threshold.
My mother's cut holes in the case but they don't match her eyes. How did she light that cigarette? Her bad arm's useless, knitted to her waist. The bird must be small, stupid from the quick catch. Shredded feathers blend into cat fur, their trapped hearts thumping. Ash falls, silver sparks radiant on the floor. I still can't see her face, just the wild tears in soft cloth. It started to fly then, up to each corner of the room. Completely quiet, hard, brushing walls, bruising the ceiling. I saw it catch a breath, then it flew some more. She won't take the pillowcase off, no matter how many times I ask. I'm looking for the bird in this small apartment. It isn't here.

MY BOYFRIEND'S A VAMPIRE

My boyfriend's a vampire, the first job candidate says, fingering each red explosion scalloping her neck. Literally dozens of hickeys. Interviewing's new to me. She wants to take care of my mother. What's the correct response? It's all he can get, she says, unbuttons her blouse to reveal a necklace of stinging oh's spooling down to her bra. He's in prison, she adds, as if that settles it. Then the ambulance pulls up, bringing my mother from the nursing home. Now she requires 24 hour care. I can start work now, she says, knows I don't have a choice. Surely she's harmless, but when my mother says I want to meet the boyfriend, I have to think it over. What does this woman want? I mean prison's been a movie backdrop or our hometown two cell jail I visited one Girl Scout field trip. Locked up for a minute was enough, though several girls wanted more. Is this merely entertainment? Just yesterday, I saw on the news some inmate caught on tape performing a six minute sex act for his blonde attorney. They didn't see the security camera. Stuck behind glass, yet his hands were moving. In the morning paper she says they're in love but he's quoted as No comment, attorney-client privilege. Prison's confinement's a confusion of love bites, damp hands in crumpled clothing. Okay, go ahead and visit, I tell my mother. Let the home health aide give up her usual hickeys and the contraband dollar bills slipped into his hand. Now she wheels my mother past desire, watchful and open-legged. The state prison's an hour away and the outing will do her good.

HOW HE SAVES ME

--for D.S.

Last summer I spent an entire morning examining expensive handbags. Reaching into store shelves, skimming metal skeletons with their weight of strappy bags, I touched brown, black, even whimsical straw. Finally I bought one I didn't need or want. I liked its secret compartment for keys. David, my therapist, returning dawn's desperation call, insists I get rid of my pills. I shook my stash from my grandmother's bone china teapot, dug at the lining of my new purse, bottle in the nightstand, even those secrets, melting in the darkness of my closed fist. This morning David asks during therapy, Do you know anyone who chose to live? My friend Carolyn bought a gun at a pawnshop. The first time she fired was into her mouth.

Randy was a simple overdose and Sweetie refused the tumor until it was too late. My favorite death was Harry's, rock and roll on the radio, car chugging in the garage as he fell asleep.

I've acquired more pills. Not a lethal dose, mind you just-in-case. Give them up or go back to the hospital,

David says at our emergency session, marches me to the psychiatrist's private bathroom. So I toss the pills into the scrubbed bowl. Notice their bright flare as they scuttle to the bottom, tumbling little gems? Flush it, he says. Dr. K. says hello as we pass him in the hall. Do you feel like an alcoholic, pouring a bottle into the sink? Such heaviness in my chest, then David takes the empty bottle and won't give it back. I remember everyone in the hospital, hundreds of brilliant plans. I'm so ordinary, the same-old same-old. I'm such a failure, and then I cry.

BLEEDING OUT

is the easiest death, someone told me. The brain relaxes, everything ticks slow motion, as the heart's circles pause and the gathering pool turns wine, thick.

On the doctor's table, leaking sugar and color, I was willing to drain away. Not all deaths are this simple. Some hearts refuse to give, even as noise disappears. My mother couldn't speak, couldn't say I'm ready when the bedside machines slowed their clatter. I waited, sure as rain, until her lungs spasmed and she lived two more evenings. My daughter, age seven, said, Let her decide when to die and maybe it was true. Her eyes open, staring past me to the foot of the bed, blood's shallows slow along her body's folds, holding her to that promise that she will finally die.

Still her chest rose, puffing towards the end.

It wasn't easy, no blood bath curdling sticky like breast milk or urine's sweet currents.

The body does what it will.

THE SPIRIT BABY

You're not pregnant, the doctor said as his hands eased from my belly's throbbing lump. Then he pressed his ear to my stomach, which wiggled under his weight and all his scratchy hair. The baby kicked or burped, or rolled over. No heartbeat, he said. How could he miss those nubby elbows and fluttering knees battering my flesh? Get dressed. As he talked, I told my imagination to shut up and be still. Some women want a baby so much, they convince themselves they're expecting, he said. Just this morning, tiny drops glittered over my nipples, bright circles gathering. Therapy's what you need, he said, told me to get dressed. Now, what to tell this pretend child jolting under my ribs? It swims and grows, its little heart hammers. Maybe a blood test will convince you. I've heard mothers and babies share blood, threading through a long leaky tube. Take that blood. This baby's mad enough to flip over, push upside down, nod into position, and say Wait here. I smile, my belly full of rushing water.

MY DAUGHTER NOTICES THE STRANGER in the neighbor's yard across the street, crouching, his pants around his ankles, collapsing into the choppy grass. What's he doing? she asks, and truth is, it's hard to tell.

Off balance, he stands, yanks his shirt to his neck, clasps hands beneath his enormous belly, and turns toward the last of the afternoon. He's all display. Maybe he's homeless, she wonders, while he stutters half-steps, basking beside the sidewalk. I was on the street once, I tell her, and it's nearly true.

Sleeping in wrinkled clothes, dragging a knapsack and wishing for a bath. I didn't like it much. Kicked outside to search for work after a breakfast of oily oatmeal and earnest hymns, I sat on benches sneering at passers-by. Never was I so gloriously naked in the middle of the day, so ecstatic in the luxury of bone, I needed to share it. He's picking up leaves, and kissing their tattered paper. Later, when the cop asks neighbors gathering in my yard, Who saw his penis?

I have to say, I did. A stranger holding himself, his broad stomach colliding with the last cold light, finding what we've all been given, stroking his skin, every bit in two giant hands.

ADOLESCENT UNIT

In the expected warren of corridors, locked doors, and lunatics, I peer through a lozenge-shaped window, waiting. Twenty-five years ago when my brother-in-law roamed the VA hospital in faded pajamas and robe, my husband called it the nuthouse. Vietnam vets fretted while starchy hands unlocked the medication cart, the narrow ward foggy from a thousand cigarettes. When group therapy's over, a chalkboard announces daily goals: Not to hate my parents; Not to be suicidal; I just want to go home. The main goal clearly is Keep busy so kids in socks sweep the floor or tinker with puzzles until someone flips a table, sending tattered pieces flying. They hate me because I can keep my laces, my daughter says, gestures to her shoes. She doesn't discuss the shallow scars lashing her body, hides her stuffed bear. It's contraband unless someone cuts off its head. No one belongs. Kids drift past, herded by someone with an ID badge. Never brave enough to look, I don't know if our daughter turns in our direction.
I remember how my husband used to slip his brother ten bucks for a carton of Luckies, though he hates smoking. It gives him something to do. I hear their slippers and socks whisper the hallways.
Airy steps, endlessly shushing away.

LAST DAY IN PARIS

Idly watching pilgrims at prayer, I set out two candles for my dead parents, let them burn. When I stepped into the psych hospital, I was afraid.

When I stepped from the cathedral, beggars swarmed me, women dressed in bright gauzes, babies on their hips.

American? As I nodded, a woman in violet stuffed a tattered paper into my hand. I require money. Surprised, I stepped back as she screamed I must have cigarettes.

She chased me across the river until I returned her note.
Sometimes we are all beggars.

I recited my medications to the hospital psychiatrist zoloft, seroquel, buspar, lithium, ambien, tegretol, ristoril, effexor.

Then added, They took away the xanax. Jesus, he said, That's quite a list. Let's tinker with the meds. Every morning he slid the window open at the nurses' station and waited for his patients. We sing: we want to sleep, we desire nightmares to lift us, voices to quiet. We are so tired of visions.

Change dictated by his careful hands, gentler than any priest. You want to be well?

I wanted an evening boat ride down the Seine, my chance to pretend I was Audrey Hepburn dressed to the teeth, hollow background of Moon River as I floated along the best view of city lights. But, how strange, the river was rising and streets were flooding. I saw a small white car wedged in the graceful arch of a bridge where it floated. I didn't get what I wanted.

Do we always require a little more? You're over medicated, the psychiatrist said and I nodded.

I have a million ideas, he said. So I stayed alive another four weeks. The morning I left the hospital he held out a piece of paper with one word written across it—Depression.

It was instead of the truth—Bipolar. He told me,
*You don't know who sees your medical records.
This will protect you*. He pressed the crisp sheet into my hand, hoping we believed the lie. The truth *means trouble. People don't understand mental illness.

You will be judged, labeled, never get a decent job*, he said, explaining my future without the paper, without the lie.

WATER LANDING

Not a man I could love, though I went with him to the picnic where we ate sweet yellow corn shaved from the cob and bowls of dripping fruit. A slice of cantaloupe beamed, strange and happy, even with its rim of angry green. He walked me to the lake in the strange near dark along a road where we left our clothes in separate piles. I wish I could say the warm water raised us into one another, that this was a man I could hold all the way to the lake's cloudy center. The chilly water smelled of dying, of fish, greenness, slime. Floating face down at the edge, I walked my hands along the mucky bottom, liking the strong pull of thick mud, the wrap of unfamiliar plants on my white skin.
He pushed behind me then, his sharp small hips striking my flesh, slapping the water into arches rising above our backs.
Lazy branches bent over the gray water, and something fine rose through the trap of smoky summer evening.
I was sinking into old soil, my face wet with whatever gathered below the surface.
Then he waited on shore while I watched the wavy surface grow pitted with small drops. Clothes I hurried into were strangely binding as I left the water behind, washed and glistening, strangely undressed.

STUDY IN FLOWERS

1.

Unidentifiable fresh flowers in a plastic jug on the hospital desk, fantastic orange blooms stumbling into purple, fist of pinks.
My husband selects them at the outdoor market, gaudiest colors, to tempt me with vividness as well as the unfamiliar.

Who wants daisies when you can look into a face bigger than a plate, wired to a green stick to prop its silly head?

I don't know their names, petaled darlings, California garden of pure astonishment. He brings a new bouquet every Sunday, visiting day, replacement.

Frivolous with their newness, I toss the old flowers into the garbage can in my room. Leftovers, all their color bled away this week as they worked hard not to bend, not to shiver in the cool hospital air.

Finally overcome, graceful, beyond full bloom.

2.

Plenty of light and water along with good soil is necessary for a perfect plant. My father's simple recipe, repeated each time I slip into the greenhouse.

He coils the hose around his trunk, showers beds of chrysanthemums. As a child I loved to watch their tight palms unfurl, sprays of petals like ballerina ruffles upside down. Some early Saturdays we drove downtown to the wholesale house to sell entire truckloads. Remember the push and muscle, bronzes, lavenders, gold and white, how they shoved their heady way through the open doors?

3.

Your flowers smell so good they stop me in the hallway.

The nurse slips in, touches her face to the bunched centers.

How odd, I didn't notice any fragrance, though I dutifully bend and inhale. I nod, friendly gesture, don't tell her I smell emptiness, and loss. Patients admire them too, remark on their heavy scent, how it fills my room and the entire hall.

NOVEMBER

This sudden sweep of wings most unlikely, seven ordinary birds

*rushing the narrow corridor.
They fly towards the locked door where they bank and turn,* *a lovely arch in this stillness.

One breath lifting past our rooms, down to the dayroom,* *beyond the soda machine.

One more spin. We stand and watch this exhalation,* *outdoors strangely indoors.

During the final trip one small bird loses its way,* *plows through the nurses' station, stops dead in the staff room.

The others leave it behind, of course,* aim for the open door, no doubt headed for the Pacific Ocean's scented wind just blocks away.

We're stunned. Does survival arrive uninvited, and what about the lost bird?

No wild wing beats, no noise. A patient shoulders her way in, and between *her cupped hands I glimpse one bitter eye.

She walks to the patio,*

half a ruined tennis court surrounded by a locked fence, grassless, without flowers. She sets the bird on cement. It hops a few times before it finally unruffles its wings and lifts directly into the damp air.

Afterword

The link between poetry and mental illness was recognized well before the time of Aristotle, who believed that poets and other creative persons tended toward “melancholia.” Several studies have shown that writers are more likely than other artists to be depressed, and that poets are more likely to be depressed than fiction writers¹. In a study published in 2001, the psychologist James Kaufman found what he termed “the Sylvia Plath effect”: that female poets are more likely even than male poets to have been hospitalized or attempted suicide. In addition, the startling mental leaps and free associations of first-rate poets – their ability to access what Freud called the “primary process” – have much in common with the thoughts and perceptions associated with some kinds of mental illness.

In Virginia Chase Sutton’s What Brings You to Del Amo, both poetry-and-mental-illness links are on display. Sutton’s poems – many set in mental hospitals and/or dealing with psychiatric problems – delight with their fresh imagery, vivid perceptions, unusual perspectives, and general liveliness, even when their subject is suffering. They also explore less frequently chronicled aspects of mental illness, including comedy, sexual highs/lows, and manic elation – “this glory” – of their bipolar narrator’s life.

*It’s as fast as chugging boilermakers at Joe’s Bar
or preening in a rummage sale rayon forties dress*

*printed in phony pink Japanese symbols. Sometimes
it’s snatching plastic daffodils from someone’s*

*yard, convinced they’re real or stealing
a gold lamé sandal at a bar, leaving its owner to hobble home...*

¹ The struggles with mental illness of Anne Sexton, Sylvia Plath, John Berryman, Delmore Schwartz, et al. are well known.

*Or you
have sex with a guy you just met at Kentucky Fried Chicken or you down more than one bottle of pink champagne*

at midnight, then hitch to the 7-Eleven at noon to buy a twelve-pack of beer...

“Copper Stars” details the narrator’s trip to a tattoo parlor where she succeeds, at least temporarily, in joining her body, and by extension her life, to the beauty and magnificence of “a tangle of stars.” “How He Saves Me” concerns a therapist helping the narrator to thwart her own suicidal impulses. “The Afternoon My Mother Wears a Pillowcase Over Her Head” is a bizarre, tragicomic, and ultimately touching portrait of the narrator’s elderly mother – not a well woman herself.

. . . Mother’s sitting
in the green recliner, a cigarette burning to ash in her good right hand . . .

My mother’s cut holes in the case but they don’t
match her eyes. How did she light that cigarette?

But What Brings You to Del Amo did not win the Morse Prize for its subject matter, fascinating as that is. This book pulses with vivid language and high energy. Some characters may be depressed, but the book is not depressing. Unlike those all-too-common collections that, like the poems inside, feel static, turgid, hard to move through, like rowing in mud, What Brings You to Del Amo pulls the reader along. The best of these poems come equipped with inboard motors, or slide them into powerful currents that carry the reader with them, briskly and pleurably, if not always comfortably. This book, in other words, is – to use a term not often applied to poetry – a good read.

Writing about mental illness can be an orgy of “Poor me, heroic me, crazy me, suffering me, misunderstood me, unique me, pathetic me, brilliant me, saintly me” –self-serving, dull. Sutton dodges these poetry-sinking reefs and snags, avoiding self-pity and self-dramatization, at the same time grabbing the reader’s attention and holding on. While other books by Baby Boomers tell and re-tell the by-now predictable struggle to come to terms with past glories and present lives, this one dives unabashedly into areas usually hidden, glossed over, hushed-up.

In “High Tea” we’re let in on “the family secret”:

... Eleanor wears a beret,
holds the thin saucer and bone china cup
while Great-aunt Mary Ellen, writer, beloved
teacher, English professor, directs
a pale stream into the delicate shell.

The women are lovers,
my mother must whisper, loving this unfolding.

In “Thanksgiving” we learn about hospital food – “One slice of white meat’s my request / in the cafeteria line, but it’s all / the same, white and dark / compressed into a jellied loaf...” – and how the narrator, at thirteen, prepared her own first turkey.

I named the bird Fred, bathed
his nakedness in the sink,
closing my eyes to the bloody neck
and packet of guts tucked inside.
A pink spill draining...

“It starts with his tongue,” the narrator says in “Telling My Cousins About Sex.”

... Open a window
when you’re done. The youngest cousin, forever excluded,
speaks from the corner, Why ever for? I answer the mirror
above the chest as it bends close to our tangle
of arms and legs. You’ll smell him for days, I say.

And then You'll like it, you really will.

In another poem, the poet's mother smokes cigars and wants to become a man, then years later, the narrator is kissed by a man who used to be a woman. This poem, called "Nothing Ordinary," aptly describes the book you now hold in your hand. You won't easily forget the characters and events described in What Brings You to Del Amo. To say that Sutton makes art out of adversity is true; all good books of poems do that. Still, I applaud the courage and craft required to write this extraordinary collection. I recommend it to you heartily.

- Charles Harper Webb, Judge for the Samuel French Morse Prize (Introduction to the first publication of What Brings You to Del Amo)

Acknowledgements

Grateful acknowledgment is made to the editors of the following publications where these poems, some of them since revised, first appeared, or are forthcoming:

Alimentum: "High Tea," "Life's a Banquet"

Antioch Review: "Drunk"

Coe Review: "What Brings You to Del Amo Hospital?"

The MacGuffin: "Manic"

National Forum: "Bleeding Out," "The Afternoon My Mother Wears a Pillowcase Over Her Head"

Paris Review: "At the Barry M. Goldwater Gunnery Range"

Patterson Literary Review: "Ars Poetica"

Ploughshares: "The Tenants"

Quarterly West: "Nothing Ordinary," "The Ecstatic Rapture"

Western Humanities Review: "My Daughter Notices the Stranger"

Witness: "Loving the Juggler," "Twenty-Five Years a Headliner," "Water Landing"

"Ars Poetica" won first place in the Allen Ginsberg Poetry Award competition.

"Drunk" is anthologized in Are You Experienced? (University of Iowa Press, 2005).

"Housekeeping" is anthologized in All This Useless Beauty: Contemporary Women Poets On Housework (University of Iowa Press, 2005).

"The Ecstatic Rapture," titled "The Hypnotist" is anthologized in Fever Dreams: Contemporary Arizona Poetry (University of Arizona Press, 1997).

"The Tenants" is anthologized in Turning Up the Leaves (Coe College Press, 2000).

"St. Luke's Hospital" was finalist for the National Poetry Competition of the National Writers Union, judged by Adrienne Rich.

“Loving the Juggler” was commissioned by the Scottsdale Cultural Council, Scottsdale, AZ, as part of a series on art and writing.

“Ars Poetica,” “Last Day in Paris,” and “How He Saves Me,” appear in the chapbook titled April: Poetry Anthology (City of Tempe, AZ, 2003).

“An Iowa Pork Princess Remembers” won first prize in the Tucson International Poetry Festival XV.

With deep thanks to many friends for their wisdom and support: Mark Doty, Michael Carter, Aaron Smith, Philip Mandel, Josie Kearns, Roger Weingarten, Jimmy Berlin and Catherine Hammond. Profound thanks to Bruce Weigl who took on my poems and shaped them into a manuscript. Thanks to Dr. Colin Ross and his program at Del Amo Hospital, where I was assisted in discovery and recovery. Thanks also to the therapists and other professionals there for their help. Special thanks to the women I met in the hospital. Their identities are disguised here, but they are the bravest souls I’ve known. With brilliance and kindness, they shared their lives in the midst of terrible pain, cared about me, and listened to and believed in my work. Thanks too, to Thomas Gazda, M.D. for being the Muse, and for leading me through the terrain of the inner life in a world with little room for fascination and obsession. And thanks to David Smart, M.A., forever steadfast in the trenches, he rescues me and teaches the beauty and necessity of trust and grace. Thanks also to H.J. Schulte, M.D., whose astute observations and constant vigilance have illuminated a path forward. And thanks as well to the Ragdale Foundation, for residencies where many of these poems were written; to the Arizona Commission on the Arts, for financial support of work on this book; and to Vermont College’s Post-Grad Summer Conference, for scholarship and support, and to Poets & Writers for financial assistance.

Doubleback Books
Sundress Publications •
Knoxville, TN

Copyright 2018 by Virginia Chase Sutton

ISBN: 978-1-939675-80-4

Published by Doubleback Books, an imprint of Sundress Publications

www.sundresspublications.com/doubleback

What Brings You To Del Amo was first published as the winner of the Morse Prize by Northeastern University Press in 2007.

Editors: Catherine Moore & Danielle Hanson

Colophon: This book is set in Book Antiqua

Cover Photograph: "Self-Portrait" by Helana Schjerfback.

Cover Design: Mariana Sierra

Book Design: Doubleback Editors

Sutton's poems—any set in mental hospitals and/or dealing with psychiatric problems—delight with their fresh imagery, vivid perceptions, unusual perspectives, and general liveliness, even when their subject is suffering.

-Charles Harper Webb, Judge for the Samuel French Morse Prize, 2007

Face it: as much as we love to glorify and extol the powers of imagination, there are some things you have to see up close and personal in order to be able to bring them into the rarified circumstance of a poem. These would include death, and even worse, all manner of human degradation and suffering possible. Still, bearing witness, no matter how intimate, is no guarantee of good art either. Virginia Chase Sutton manages, no, she illuminates a seamlessness between what is real, and what is barely imaginable in our lives with such precision that you are compelled to bear witness beside her. The poems of What Brings You to Del Amo are relentless in their pursuit of us, and relentless too in their pursuit of the highest level of craft and care.

-Bruce Weigl, author of The Abundance of Nothing

"Never construct narrative," says a hospital shrink in Virginia Chase Sutton's riveting suite of poems, "all you get are scraps." But the marvel of Sutton's book is her ability to order a flashing series of scenes in order to tell, almost recklessly, not without hope, not without tenderness in the face of desolation, a life. A shattered life—but the irony of that doctor's advice is that these fragments shored up against their speaker's ruin make, indeed, a coherent, vital testament, tenaciously alive.

-Mark Doty, author of Fire to Fire: New and Selected Poems, National Book Award

Virginia Chase Sutton is the author of the full-length collections Embellishments, What Brings You to Del Amo, and Of a Transient Nature, and the chapbook, Down River. Sutton's poems have won the Louis Untermeyer Poetry Scholarship at Bread Loaf, the Allen Ginsberg Poetry Award, and the National Poet Hunt. She has been a fellow at Writers at Work, the Ragdale Foundation, and the Vermont Studio Center. Sutton has won the Paumanock Visiting Writer's Award and Reading Series and has been a finalist for the Dana Award in Poetry. Her poems have appeared in many journals, including Paris Review, Ploughshares, Western Humanities Review, and Poet Lore, and have received seven Pushcart nominations. Sutton lives in Tempe, Arizona.